Assessment is a valuable tool for professionals and students who are concerned about the richness and complexity of children's development within their families and communities.

In the present study we examined parent participation in an extra-familial context (Head Start) and the family and child development conditions that predicted such participation.

Participants included 3-, 4-, and 5-year-olds and their parents in the Northern Utah and Southeastern Idaho

Access Free Dial 3 Essment Areas. The families were grouped according to the child's previous Head Start experience: those who had received home-based services in year one followed by center-based services in the second year (I-IB to CB); those who had received no services in year one and home-based services in year two (HB only); and those families who had received no services in year one and center-based services in year two (CB only). Parent involvement was measured using the Family Involvement Questionnaire (FIQ) which measured parent involvement factors: home-based involvement (II BI), school-based involvement (SBJ), and home-school conferencing (1-ISC).

The children's development assessments included the Ages and Stages Questionnaire: Social-Emotional Scale (ASQ:SE) and the

Indicators for the

using the FIQ, this children's ASQ:SE, and DIAL 3 scores as independent variables. Our study revealed that even though the class grouping had no significant relation to parent involvement, there were a few independent variables that were beneficial in predicting parents' involvement. The most significant finding was that the child's ASQ:SE score could be used to help predict the variance in both home-based involvement and school-based involvement activities. This study found that the higher the number of the ASQ:SE score, the parents were less likely to participate in home-based and school-based activities. Other interesting findings included that as the number of children increased, the amount of home-based parent involvement decreased. In addition to this, we found that if the parents were European-American and married, they
